Reply to Queries on GeM/ Clarification :

No. Representation Clarification for making the specification for the state of the art Hybrid

Cath Lab adopted from Central Government insitute (Base Hospital Armed Forces, Department of Defence)

1 The requirement of a carbon fiber platform replacing the patient mattress with inbuilt shielding is a very specific design feature and is not a standard requirement across widely accepted radiation protection systems available worldwide. The requirement for a radiolucent patient platform with integrated shielding, replacing the OEM mattress, is a functional specification grounded in clinical consultation and procedure-room safety, not a vendor-specific design feature.

Consultations with interventional cardiologists across multiple centres, supported by available clinical literature, indicate that compliance with radiation protection is consistently higher when the protective system is fixed to the procedure table rather than deployed as accessory-based or freestanding equipment. Systems requiring per-case setup are subject to user variability and omission under time pressure; a table-integrated platform delivers protection passively in every procedure, eliminating compliance gaps.

The integrated configuration is further driven by procedure-room safety. Cath labs must maintain adequate clear floor space for nursing movement and emergency response. A table-integrated platform removes these freestanding structural elements from the procedure-room floor. It is also noted that most scatter protection systems available internationally are oriented primarily to ward the primary operator, with limited coverage for the broader cath lab team, and many introduce workflow disruption between cases. The clinical requirement is for a system that protects all personnel across the full range of procedure types, without per-case workflow disruption.

The technical rationale is as follows. The platform houses internal radiation shielding positioned between the patient and the under-table scatter source, contributing directly to the documented reduction in radiation dose to the patient's head during cardiac procedures — a benefit that cannot be achieved through accessory drapes or operator-worn protection alone, since these do not sit between the patient and the X-ray tube. The platform construction material is specified on functional grounds: a radiolucent structural material that does not attenuate the primary imaging beam, offers a high strength-to-weight ratio to preserve procedure-table movement performance, and provides sufficient structural rigidity to serve as a mounting base for modular shielding components.

The specification therefore describes a functional protection architecture that delivers passive, always-on, integrated protection, and is open to any patient platform meeting these functional outcomes.

2 Quad-layer memory foam with support for chest compressions appears unrelated to radiation protection performance and seems to align with a particular OEM configuration. As cardiologists, we face issues where we might be required to give CPR to our patients to save their life. We would prefer a system which also has additional features of CPR support. It should be convenient, easy to use during the times of emergency. We require a system which not only provides radiation protection but also supports our day to day working inside the cath lab. We want a system which is comfortable for the patient for long hour treatment to prevent pressure injuries during long interventional procedures and maintains patient stability.

3 Built-in railing systems integrated into the base platform further narrows the scope to a single design type, whereas most international systems provide modular or independent mounting solutions. We require a table-mounted radiation protection system integrated with the cath lab to ensure it remains fixed, readily available, and does not require repeated movement during procedures. This supports consistent radiation protection compliance, improves workflow efficiency, and minimizes procedural interruptions. Integrated railing systems are specified for functional requirements such as secure mounting, C-arm collision management, unobstructed staff movement, and better emergency access within the cath lab environment. The requirement is performance-based and not intended to restrict participation to any single design or OEM configuration; equivalent integrated or modular solutions meeting the intended clinical and operational objectives may also be considered. A modular design further allows rapid access during complications and supports easy transfer between labs when required.

4 Combination of head flex shields, side flex shields, corner shields, pillow flip shields, and workbench with hip shield represents proprietary naming and configuration, rather than standardized functional requirements. As interventional cardiologists, the requirement for the specified combination of shielding components reflects the clinical reality of who is exposed to scatter radiation in a cath lab and where that exposure is concentrated. It is a functional specification for comprehensive multi-zone scatter protection, not a proprietary configuration.

Scatter radiation in interventional procedures is not uniform. It is concentrated in predictable anatomical zones based on the X-ray tube position, the patient's body, and the primary beam path. Documented scatter intensity is highest below the table and at the head end of the table, with additional zones around the access site and at the operator's workspace. A system that addresses only one or two of these zones leaves significant residual exposure to staff working at other positions, which is why comprehensive multi-zone coverage is the mechanism by which substantial scatter-reduction figures are achieved.

The clinical requirement reflects this scatter physics. We require a system that provides protection to every staff member inside the cath lab, including those who work at the head of the table — echocardiographers during structural heart procedures, anaesthesiologists managing the airway, nurses positioned for patient monitoring, and operators performing left-sided cardiac procedures including cardiac implantable electronic device implants and electrophysiology cases. We are also responsible for the cumulative dose received by staff during emergency procedures such as primary PCI, where shielding must be effective without any per-case set-up burden. Protection must therefore extend from head to foot of the operator and across the full perimeter of the patient — head to foot — because every staff member standing around the patient is exposed to scatter from these zones.

The system must operate passively. Shields must not require shifting in or out of the cath lab table between cases, must not disturb workflow, and must accommodate C-arm movement during angulated views without restricting gantry rotation. We also prefer a system that provides some level of radiation protection to the patient, particularly to the patient's head during cardiac procedures.

5 The requirement of a handheld-only form factor is design-specific and does not directly impact the clinical performance or accuracy of cardiac output measurement. Globally accepted systems are available in both handheld and trolley-mounted configurations, offering the same or superior clinical performance. With regard to item SI No. 2 it is accepted that both handheld and trolley-mounted configurations offer similar clinical outcomes. However, the department is handling emergency patients from across the North Eastern States and within the departmental transfers from ICCU to Cath Lab etc. Therefore, it is desirable to have a monitor which has rechargeable battery which may perhaps be used for transfers of patients from different ICUs to Cath Lab and also in the hours of need monitors may be mobilized for transferring the patients in the Cath Lab from other areas of the city etc. On the line the representations may be disposed off.

6 Item SI no 2: Non-invasive cardiac output monitor based on validated technologies such as electrical velocimetry, bioimpedance, bioimpedance, Doppler, or equivalent, available in handheld, compact, or trolley-mounted configurations. The insistence on a handheld device may exclude advanced systems. With regard to item SI.No. 2 the following clarification may be considered.

- The technology based on Electrical Cardiometry technology which is compatible to be used in Pre Term, Neonatal, Paediatric along with Adult patient. The numerous clinical documents are available including AIIMS New Delhi on the validity for this point of specification.

- Similarly, this point of representation may be disposed off.

7 Item SI no 2: It is requested that clinical outcomes depend on accuracy, validation, and usability, rather than only on portability. In many hospital environments, trolley-mounted systems are preferred for continuous monitoring, data recording, and multi-parameter integration. With regard to item SI.No. 2 the following clarification may be considered.

- ICON will detect and display pacing signal on its screen real time required for pacemaker connected in the cath-lab. Available clinical data from AIIMS Delhi supports it.

- Multiple clinical articles available from AIIMS - New Delhi

Question 1. How to calculate Local Content?

Answer: Para 2 of the PPP-MII Order, 2017 (as amended on 16.09.2020) defines local content as Local content' means the amount of value added in India which shall, unless otherwise prescribed by the Nodal Ministry, be the total value of the item procured (excluding net domestic indirect taxes) minus the value of imported content in the item (including all customs duties) as a proportion of the total value, in percent.

Mathematically,

Local content = (Sale price - Value of imported content) * 100/ Sale price

Where, "Sale price" means price excluding net domestic indirect taxes and "Value of imported content" means price of imported content inclusive of all customs duties

Question2. How to calculate Local Content in bids involving supply of multiple items from single bidder?

Answer: In case of bids requiring supply of multiple items (say "X1", "X2" and "X3") by a single bidder, the local content in the bid shall be

Local content = ((Sale price of "X1" - Value of imported content in "X1") + (Sale price of "X2" - Value of imported content in "X2") + (Sale price of "X3" - Value of imported content in "X3")) * 100/

(Sale price of "X1" + Sale price of "X2" + Sale price of "X3")
